Butterflies of War is a commentary on the absurdity of war. The text is intended to confuse the viewer; butterflies and wars are two entities that are not commonly associated with one another. My hope is that the viewer will recognize the disconnect in the text and take a closer look at the picture for an explanation. Upon closer inspection of the image, the viewer will see that butterflies are composed of tanks. The text at the bottom of the poster, "Sherman Butterflies" should also hint at the fact these butterflies are, in fact, Sherman tanks. The point of making butterflies out of tanks is to emphasize the point that wars are not found in nature. Only humans fight wars. It seems ludicrous to have butterflies fighting wars with other butterflies; hopefully, the viewers will extend this thought and conclude that it is also ridiculous for humans to fight wars against other humans.
