This course is designed to introduce students to fundamental issues and debates in the writing of history. It will feature innovative historical accounts written in recent years. The class will consider such questions as the words historians use, their language, sources, methods, organization, framing, and style. How does the choice of each of these affect the historian’s work? How does the author choose, analyze, and present evidence? How effective are different methodologies?

Students will be asked to develop a major research paper (15-20 pages in length). For departmental majors this project can serve as a pilot study for the senior thesis. In addition each student will write a one- to two-page response paper most weeks discussing the major arguments and methods used in that week’s readings. There will also be three shorter assignments due on March 6, March 20 and April 3. For the first students will prepare a research proposal of the principal questions and sources for the paper. The second will consist of a detailed bibliography of primary sources to be used. The third will discuss the sources and arguments in more depth.

Participation in the course will be evaluated as follows: 1) class participation and response papers (20%); 2) research preparation (bibliography of sources and discussion of sources) (20%); 3) research paper (40%); 4) class presentation (20%). Attendance each week is absolutely mandatory.

Plagiarism will not be tolerated in any form, whether it is “borrowing” someone else’s language or appropriating someone else’s argument (even in paraphrased form). All ideas and all language must be given appropriate citation. Any case of plagiarism will be taken to the appropriate deans and there is a distinct chance the student involved will flunk the course. The point of this course is to learn to find evidence, analyze it, make an argument or arguments, and present that work in original and compelling language.

Books for the Course

- Peter Kolchin, Unfree Labor (Cambridge, 1987)
- E. P. Thompson, The Making of the English Working Class
Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (New York, 1976, 1983)

An asterix indicates readings available in the sourcepak on reserve in the Hayden Reserve Reading Room.

Feb. 6 – Introduction - The Meanings of history

Feb. 13 – Words, the building blocks

Raymond Williams, Keywords, Introduction (26 pp.) and 15 entries (especially recommended: history, culture, art, industry, democracy, civilization, class, educated, work)

Thinking and writing assignment: What pattern can you see in the words Williams has chosen to analyze? What order would you recommend that they be read in if not alphabetical? Can you think of meanings and usages that he has not addressed? Is there anything historical about your experience of these words in the early 21st century?

Go to the web site of the Oxford English Dictionary (http://dictionary.oed.com/entrance.dtl) and investigate one or more words of your own choosing. Can you think of words that do not appear in the OED because they are too modern? Can you think of words whose meanings have changed in your lifetime? Can you think of words that have had particular currency this fall with all the international developments? Have any of their meanings changed? Alternatively, are there words from a particular historical period you are interested in that you would want to comment on?

Feb. 20 - The Historian’s voice

*Hayden White, “The Value of Narrativity in the Representation of Reality” in The Content of the Form, pp. 1-25

Thinking and writing: Think about the different narratives that these historians have created about the Russian revolutions of 1917, keeping in mind that these are only excerpts and do not necessarily reveal all their evidence and/or thinking. What are their arguments? What are their sources? What do think is the relationship between their evidence and their arguments? Can you hypothesize which is the driving force in each case: the evidence or the arguments or a combination of the two? What can you say about their styles and the ways they narrate their accounts?
Feb. 27 - Interrogating evidence
  Natalie Zemon Davis, Fiction in the Archives, pp. 1-114, 141-42 [t=140]
  Thinking and writing: In these two works Ginzburg and Davis consider the particular problem of evidence extracted in “trials.” Why do you think they have focused on these problems? What do you think of their arguments? What are their methods? How do they analyze their evidence?

March 6 - Evidence from the physical world
  Thinking and writing: How does Cronon’s evidence impact his argument? What kinds of written and non-written evidence does he use? What difference does the type of evidence make?
  Also due: A one-page preliminary research proposal. What kinds of sources do you plan to use? What kinds of questions do you think you’ll ask? Do you have any working hypotheses as to what you may or may not find?

March 13 - Voice and historical subject
  John Demos, Unredeemed captive, Preface, 3-198, 237-41
  Thinking and writing: John Demos writes extensively about his methods in trying to recapture the voices and experiences of his historical subjects. What do you think he is trying to say? How would you characterize his methods? How well do his methods work?

March 20 - Oral history
  Christian Appy, Working-Class War, pp. 1-85, 117-44, 206-49, 298-321
  Thinking questions: How does Appy gather his evidence? What does he consider authoritative evidence? How does he convey his subjects’ voices? How does the “authority” of their experience influence us as readers? Compare and contrast Demos and Appy. What aspects of their subjects’ voices are fairly easy to recover? What kinds of creative moves do you see them having to make?
  Written assignment: list of sources due. You are to bring in a complete or nearly complete list of primary sources that you intend to use for your paper (and where you have found them).

March 27 - No class - spring break

April 3 – Macro-historical structures
Thinking questions: What is E. P. Thompson’s principal question and what kinds of evidence does he bring to bear? Who is he arguing against? Of all the different kinds of evidence he brings to bear, what do you find the most compelling?

Written assignment (2-3 pp.): Discuss your sources in detail and the argument that you think you will make in your longer paper. You can write this paper in an informal style if you like. Imagine that you are conversing with a favorite relative or friend. Tell them the pros and cons of the evidence you have and what you’d like to do with it. If you are finding that you are short on a particular kind of evidence, discuss what you wish you could know and how it might be possible to find it.

April 10 - Drama in history (guest speaker: Jeff Ravel)

Sara Maza, Private Lives and Public Affairs, pp. 1-17, 167-211 (“Diamond Necklace Affair”) [60] [t=122]

Thinking and writing: Historians sometimes have huge debates over what they call “theory” and what they call “method.” To what extent do you think the two can be separated? How does reading the criticisms of Darnton affect your understanding of what Maza is doing?

April 17 - Comparative history

Peter Kolchin, Unfree Labor, pp. ix-xiii, 1-102, plus one further chapter (to be divided among the class)

Thinking and writing: Consider carefully the evidence that Kolchin uses in his comparison of American slavery and Russian serfdom. What examples work most effectively to draw comparisons and contrasts between the two systems? Do you find his arguments compelling? In what ways (if any) does his use of comparative history sharpen his work? In what ways (if any) does it make the work more difficult or less compelling?

April 24 – “Truth” and “falsehood” - narratives and counternarratives

* Stephen F. Cohen, Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution, pp. 372-81 [t=120]

Thinking and writing: The “show trials” of the 1920s and ’30s raise important question of truth and falsehood in one’s sources. How do you evaluate the “truth” and “falsehood” of Soviet claims concerning these events?

May 1 - Class presentations
Written assignment: Your research papers are due in fully documented form on this date. No late papers will be accepted without valid excuse. You will also give a 15-minute presentation so everyone can hear each other’s work.

May 8 - Memory and history, part I
   Michel-Rolph Trouillot, Silencing the Past: Power and the Production of History (Beacon Press, 1995), entire Thinking and writing: Trouillot is making some pretty strong arguments about the nature of history and how it is written. How do they sound now that you have a read a number of different historians who are using different kinds of evidence and writing different kinds of history? (You may want to use specific examples from various readings you have done this semester.)

May 15 - Last class - Memory, II - To be decided
